presence of this idea. My attention was first drawn to it by watching a man castrate a young European pig he had just purchased from a trader. Knowing that European pigs are greatly prized, I asked him why he did not leave the pig alone so that he could mate it with his sow. (Pigs of mixed origin are counted as European pigs.) His reply was that what he was doing would not interfere with that at all, he would get European pigs from his sow just the same, because he only cut away the testicles (orn) and not the penis (utsin). To emphasize his point he reminded me that all the young males among the village pigs were castrated, but that the sows continued to produce young. There are plenty of wild pigs in the bush who have free access to the domestic sows, but this explanation was not accepted when I offered it.[1] The belief in the sufficiency of penetration was then stated, and further conversation elicited the fact that it was considered to apply also in the case of human beings.

Given this idea, it is not such a very far cry to the further belief that conception can take place without the co-operation of the male, and there is no doubt that this also is held. The legend, widespread over this area, which traces the origin of all the people from the two sons of an old woman who impregnated herself by means of a banana, is literally believed. It is admitted that this story belongs to times long past, but in a discussion arising out of its narration the opinion was expressed among the audience that it was still possible for a woman to conceive by means of a banana, and the same thing was asserted by an altogether different informant on another occasion, when we were discussing ceremonies and taboos associated with birth. The connexion between bananas and child-bearing appears again in the ceremony for a girl's first menstruation, when the girl climbs a banana palm of a species whose fruit may never be eaten by children, or by boys wearing the upi (see p. 254). In discussing certain prohibitions connected with the planting and eating of bananas in the south-eastern Solomons, Ivens suggests that this plant may in the past have possessed a sacred character, and supports his suggestion by citing parallels from other peoples. He need not have gone as far afield

[1] Malinowski records a similar experience (1929, p. 162). The reason given to me, on more than one occasion, for the practice of castrating the domestic pigs, is that it prevents them from becoming wild and running away into the bush, and that if they should do so, it enables the hunters who might catch them in their nets to recognise them as somebody's property and let them go.
